 The prospect that our attempts at explanation in biology may lead us in the end into psychology is distasteful to the natural science of our time. Psychology, with its phenomena grasped by the understanding rather than by the senses ancLwith its suspicious affinities with philosophy, appears as a sort of mysticism; and natural science, which trusts only to the senses and mistrusts reason and philosophy alike, must not come to that. That would be to end in darkness."—A. PAULY.